The interpretation of bodies as trans represents a family of ways in which bodies may be interpreted socially as sexed—as gender-disordered, as inconsistently/insufficiently/clockably/unexpectedly/confusingly/upsettingly/disgustingly male or female, etc.

The analytical category persons seeking gender-affirming care consists of those who are systematically subordinated along some dimension (economic, political, legal, social, etc.) due to (actually or potentially) observed or imagined bodily features presumed (taken, suspected, expected, etc.) to be evidence of a (present, previous, or future) body socially interpreted as gender-disordered.
