DISSERTATION
ABSTRACT

My dissertation presents an account of transgender equality as an element, requirement, and condition of gender equality, which I defend on the grounds that it resolves difficult conceptual challenges that continue to frustrate current feminist theory and politics. I argue that an empirically and explanatorily adequate treatment of transgender equality in particular and gender equality more broadly needs to take seriously both the gender (the social metaphysics) and the equality (the political philosophy) of gender equality, not just one or the other. The upshot is that transgender equality not only poses pressing difficulties for, but more constructively sheds refreshing light on, our understanding of the meaning and requirements of gender equality.

Taking emerging doctrinal issues in U.S. constitutional law as my point of departure, the three papers in Part I draw on the metaphysics of gender to work out an analysis of gender equality that for the first time makes sense of both pregnancy and transgender discrimination as issues of gender without diminishing trans people's lived genders. At the heart of this analysis is an account of gender discrimination in terms of substantive disadvantages enabled by the unequal social meaning of bodies being interpreted as sexed one way or another, which I in turn theorize by way of nonbinary gender categories such as pregnant persons and persons diagnosed with gender dysphoria. The four papers that make up Part II then bring the analysis of transgender equality as gender equality fleshed out in Part I back to bear on the metaphysics of gender. Rejecting the prevailing understanding that the concept of gender identity is key to explaining trans people's genders, I offer an account of gender as a constructive process of social interpretation on the model of inference to the best explanation—quite literally, I argue, like building with Legos.
