DISSERTATION ABSTRACT	I present the first workable theory of what gender is and how it works that both readily translates into much-needed frameworks for analyzing (trans)gender equality rights in constitutional law and does so in a way that begins with trans people's lived material realities from the ground up, breaking away from prevailing alternatives which primarily seek to retrofit trans experiences into dominant conceptual frameworks and social institutions. Engaging closely with ways in which legal, medical, and carceral institutions define, administer, discipline, and reify gender, I argue that an adequate analysis of transgender equality in particular and gender equality more broadly must take seriously both the gender (the social metaphysics) and the equality (the political and legal philosophy) of gender equality, not just one or the other. I suggest that getting this right is crucial to securing equal justice for trans people, offer it as a constructive intervention to facilitate meaningful self-understanding, legal protection, and social change, and show that it resolves long-standing conceptual and methodological problems that continue to frustrate feminist theory and politics today.
